<Community group> fighting for our world this Earth Hour 2020

More people than ever are waking up to the climate crisis and wanting to make a difference. That's why <Community group> is demonstrating its commitment by joining WWF's Earth Hour, the world's largest grassroots movement for the environment.

By switching off at 8.30pm on Saturday 28 March, <Community group> is joining millions around the globe fighting for our world and being part of the change.

To mark the global event this year, <Community group> switched off their non-essential lights and organised their own Earth Hour event: <insert details of event>

<Community group> is a <nature of your group> and brings people together to <activity of your group>. Since its creation in <date>, it has accomplished <example>.

Lang Banks, director at WWF Scotland said:

"We are very pleased that <Community group> is again taking part in WWF's Earth Hour. More and more people are waking up to the climate and nature crisis. Earth Hour is a great opportunity to take an hour out of our busy lives, switch off our lights and just spend time reconnecting with what's important to us. We've pushed species to extinction and messed up our climate. It's time for us all to be part of the change to reverse the damage and restore nature and our environment. Earth Hour gives a powerful voice to people everywhere who want to put the world on the path to recovery."

About Earth Hour

Earth Hour, organised by WWF, started in Sydney in 2007. Over a decade on, last year saw hundreds of millions of individuals in more than 180 countries and territories take part in the world's biggest Earth Hour yet.

In Scotland alone, national and local landmarks such as The Kelpies, Edinburgh Castle and The Scottish Parliament switched off for Earth Hour. Scotland was the first country on record to gain support from all local authorities, continuing to make its mark on the international Earth Hour map.
